

Cold Berlin

Chapter 1 by Abbey Bee

Abbey Bridley was thinking about Joseph knight again. Joseph was an arrogant engineer with solid arms and charming eyes.

Abbey walked over to the window and reflected on her dull surroundings. She had always hated cold Berlin with its purring, plain parks. It was a place that encouraged her tendency to feel frustrated.

Then she saw something in the distance, or rather someone. It was the arrogant figure of Joseph knight.

Abbey gulped. She glanced at her own reflection. She was an admirable, clumsy, tea drinker with chubby arms and fragile eyes. Her friends saw her as a wide, watery writer. Once, she had even helped a xenophobic puppy cross the road.

But not even an admirable person who had once helped a xenophobic blind man cross the road, was prepared for what Joseph had in store today.

The rain hammered like shouting pigeons, making Abbey concerned. Abbey grabbed a thick book that had been strewn nearby; she massaged it with her fingers.

As Abbey stepped outside and Joseph came closer, she could see the breakable glint in his eye. Joseph gazed with the affection of 6426 thoughtless regurgitated rabbits. He said, in hushed tones, "I love you and I want closure."

Abbey looked back, even more concerned and still fingering the thick book. "Joseph, I just don't need you in my life anymore," she replied.

They looked at each other with sad feelings, like two obedient, obnoxious owls talking at a very clever snow storm, which had indie music playing in the background and two bold uncles stealing in the heat.

Abbey regarded Joseph's warm hands and said, "I feel the same way!" revealed Abbey with a delighted grin.

Joseph looked afraid, his chest heaving. "I love you," he said.

Then Joseph came inside for a nice cup of tea.
